Rethinking retirement portfolios

Different investment needs demand a different investment approach

Accumulating wealth through superior investment returns is often a key focus during an investor's working life. Investment portfolios become skewed towards growth assets, such as equities, with little regard for the risks associated with targeting higher returns.

However, as investors move from accumulating to preserving wealth, their investment needs and risk profiles change. Chasing higher returns becomes less important. Instead, receiving income, lowering risk and cautiously growing wealth, become critical.

But are retirement investment portfolios changing accordingly?

Retirees have different investment needs

Unlike investors accumulating wealth, retirees broadly need:

1. Regular income

As investors move permanently out of the workforce their focus shifts from building assets to drawing down on their capital. Without a regular wage or salary, retirees are more reliant on deriving income from their investments to cover expenses and over the longer term, to adjust for the rising cost of living.

2. Lower investment risk

As well as income, retirees often seek to reduce their investment risk to ensure their money lasts. They have limited ability to benefit from market volatility, which can play a positive role in a wealth accumulator's portfolio when growth assets are purchased during weak markets. In retirement, however, investors have less time to invest and capital available to tolerate, or take advantage of, adverse market movements.

Minimising the amount retirees draw down is critical to preserving capital. However, if a retiree's portfolio comprises only growth assets, selling investments to generate income when markets are down means that when markets improve, the capital value is unlikely to recover.

3. Investment growth

Thinking longer term during retirement can be overshadowed by more immediate living expenses. However, with inflation and market movements inevitable over the long term, achieving some capital growth during retirement can provide a buffer to market downturns and reduce the risk of outliving one's savings.

Rethinking investing in retirement

Retiree investment portfolios have traditionally favoured defensive assets, such as fixed income and cash. Although this strategy may deliver regular income and reduced volatility, low interest rates may not generate sufficient income to adequately sustain retirees over the long term.

Many believe blending defensive and growth assets can smooth returns and reduce investment risk. However, these portfolios generally cannot absorb the occasional extreme shocks equities can experience. If a portfolio suffers a loss, to recover the original capital base, investors must take on more risk or extend their investment time horizon in the market.

Equity income strategy

"With living costs rising and people living longer, there is a real social and financial risk that retirees employing only an asset allocation strategy may outlive their savings."

An equity income strategy has the potential to reduce this risk and become an integral part of a balanced retirement investment portfolio.

Equity income funds aim to generate income by investing in shares in a risk-controlled manner. Exposure to equities allows retirees to access the inherent income-producing abilities of companies coupled with their potential to deliver higher returns, and importantly for eligible investors, the benefit of franking credits. A strong emphasis on managing downside risk aims to reduce the risk of capital loss.

Funds like the Vertium Equity Income Fund (Fund) are designed to address the needs and satisfy the risk appetite of retirees by providing an attractive mix of higher income, reduced volatility and capital growth.

"Pre-retirees and retirees have different investment needs. We aim to not only preserve retirement savings while delivering regular income, but grow capital in a risk-controlled way so investors may have more for longer."

“Loss avoidance is the cornerstone of our investment philosophy. We prefer to miss out on opportunities than increase the risk of capital loss by chasing higher returns.”
